the bank, wondering how he managed to get himself into? Should you wire money? You recall all the amusing discussions you've had with him, and a sudden insight lets you understand that Tibor Gliere had no close friends except for you. Should you go help him? You suppose the University will grant you leave. But do you want to go?

With uncommon speed you decide to go to Athens to help Gliere. You write him a wire, and another to Ernest Holt, a wealthy New York financier and a good friend of yours. If you get into hot water, Holt will help, and so, you decide to keep him posted on your progress. You give both telegrams to the waiting messenger, along with the necessary funds.

What to do now? You'll go to the bank in the morning to get travel funds. As for Transatlantic schedules, well the Advertiser surely carries information. As you pack, you wonder if Gliere's room at Mrs. Harding's boarding house you could get a clue about Gliere's activities.

Your passport is in order; your clothes are packed. You'd best turn in. You're going to bed. When you awake, it is Sept. 2; go to 102.

1.030. GREEK CONSULATE (Entry 130)

Concerning Greek criminal matters, they advise visiting the Athens Bureau of Investigation on arrival. A Corporal Ilianos, they say, has handled the Gliere case.

You ask for information about the National Museum and its treasures, but they have only an unhelpful travel brochure. They jokingly caution you about the cab drivers of Athens. You may go to any New York Location.
